The Reflexions of a short-lived woman are not pleasant if she is delicate, run-down, or over-worked. She feels "played out." Her smile and her good spirits have taken flight. It worries her husband as well as herself.

This is the time to build up her strength and cure those weaknesses or ailments which are the seat of her trouble.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription regulates and promotes all the proper functions of womanhood, improves digestion, enriches the blood, dispels acidity and pain, and restores health and strength. It is a safe remedial agent, a tonic and nerve stimulant, and cures those disorders and derangements incident to womanhood, or the money paid for it is returned, or it would not pay to sell a poor medicine on these terms.

These wouldn't be any cases of Chronic Catarrh if everyone used Dr. Sage's Remedy. It cures 99 out of 100 cases.

Exclusive "Dan" Lamont.

You would not expect that the most exclusive member of the cabinet would be the man who once sold newspapers upon the streets of the capital city of New York. But such is the case. Secretary Lamont is the most exclusive member of Mr. Cleveland's cabinet, and keeps more to himself than has any Secretary of War for many years. There was a little State formality in the War Department in the days of dry-humored, kind-hearted Secretary Proctor, or in those of bluff, hearty, vigorous Secretary Elkins. Under the Endicott regime, in the former Cleveland administration, there was a great deal of frigid courtesy and strict attention to official etiquette. But under the Lamont sway there is even more than under the reign of the man from Massachusetts and the City of the Witches.

It is harder to get an opportunity to see Secretary Lamont than it is any other cabinet officer. You can walk without reserve into Gresham's room and be sure of a hearty western greeting; you can gossip with Carlisle over persons and things; but you can do none of these things with Lamont. There is a covering of reserve about him that it is impossible to break through. He has a combined air of business and mystery that makes familiarity a stranger. He always has the appearance of man who is too busy to talk with you, and who regards you as wasting every moment of his time during the while you are with him. He has been the confidential man of so many prominent men, Tilden, Cleveland, and the rest, and so accustomed to keep their secrets locked up in his breast, that he has repressed his feelings so long in his efforts to be studiously diplomatic, that natural cordiality he has lost.

Lamont is in his office less time than any member in the Cabinet. He is not so much a Cabinet officer as Mr. Cleveland's confidential advisor. He never was more thoroughly the President's private secretary than he is today. He does the private secretary's thinking, while Mr. Thurber holds the position and attends to the routine. Thurber is the clerk and Lamont the secretary. What is more, Lamont is the power behind the throne. Democrats of national reputation from all parts of the country can come to the White House and lay down their burdens of advice; leading financiers can come with their solutions of the hard times problems; friends of the administration can point out what men should be appointed and what ones should be removed; but a little word from the Secretary of War will make their efforts valueless. Whenever there is a question in the President's mind as to what should be done it is to "Dan" he turns for advice, and "Dan" is always ready with a solution.

Lamont is the politician of the administration, and his real title is "secretary of politics and expediency." He was put into the cabinet for this purpose. This was why he refused to be Postmaster-General. That office would require too much attention; he preferred the war portfolio, for in that department matters drift along easily and quietly, and practically run themselves. He is a good executive officer, that he has shown and is showing; but above all he is a politician. All his life he has been devoted to politics, and he was a politician as soon as it was possible for him to be one. His father's store at the little cross roads in New York State was his primary political school, and a good one it proved. At 20 years of age Lamont was sitting side by side with Tilden at that famous Rochester democratic convention and helping the democratic chieftain to cut the Tweed cancer out of the body of the democratic party.

He carries his exclusiveness into his private life. He lives at the Arlington, but is seldom seen either in the office or in the public dining-room. He takes his meals in his own rooms, and keeps by himself through most of the day. He is the one person to whom the door of the White House is never shut and whom the President is never too busy to see. He is in daily conference with Mr. Cleveland. Taking to politics as a duck does to water, Lamont has busied himself in all the campaigns in New York from 1875, the year that Tilden cut loose from the old politicians of the State, to the present. He knows every democrat of any prominence in the State, and is the President's oracle on matters relating to them. He does not care for society, and goes out only for the sake of his wife. He reads books much; but he is fond of newspapers and retains the ability of a journalist to read all the papers without performing the work of actually reading one.

He uses not her tobacco nor liquor, no matter what the occasion. On one occasion he said all his people were Presbyterians, and that he was brought up in that faith. "And do you attend a Presbyterian church in town?" he was asked. "My wife does," said he—an answer that was the fruit of twenty years of training in politics. Lamont is a quiet and unobtrusive man, slow and quiet in speech and modest in demeanor. He is a good story teller with a wonderful knack at turning the experiences of his friends to narrative account. He is always well dressed, with a preference for what are called "business" clothes, though he gives but little thought to his appearance. In everything except his abundant humor he is an intensely practical man, who looks upon the world as a workshop in which he has enough to do to keep him busy all his life. And in politics he is no less practical than in all things else. And he is also the exclusive man of Mr. Cleveland's second Cabinet, this young Secretary of War.—Balt. News.

She gained 31 pounds in weight, attended school regularly, has excellent appetite and sleeps well."—Mrs. R. R. Bullock, Brighton, N. Y. Nervine is sold by all druggists on a positive guarantee.
